Topic: Is global cooperation necessary? (Argumentative Essay)

Problems with Global Cooperation

It is a controversial topic whether global cooperation is necessary or not. Generally, global cooperation has a considerable impact on people. Moreover, multinational cooperation causes some problems in the sense of environment and economy. These issues are getting worse since people support global cooperation. Overall, global cooperation is not necessary because it causes vital problems such as environmental pollution and a huge economical gap among countries despite the fact that some people disagree with these ideas.

First of all, as Alan Smith mentions, “By working together, Canada and the US are protecting the environment on both sides of the border.” However, in reality, global cooperation brings about harmful effects in the world. The more global cooperation gains strength, the more the world suffers from the impacts global cooperation creates. To illustrate, multinational companies tend to set up new factories, and supporters of these companies defend that they build for people’s needs. In contrast to this, global cooperation is one of the factors which causes global warming, and climate change because they cut down trees for constructions of their companies and these corporations lead to carbon emissions. Thus, global cooperation does not help the environmental issues, but it creates these kinds of problems.

Second of all, some people claim that integration of countries which have developed economies stand for an essence of cooperation. Nevertheless, global cooperation has much more power compared to poor countries. Underdeveloped countries might struggle with the franchises which are given to multinational companies. Countries with strong economies create a huge gap between developed and undeveloped countries. To prevent this huge gap, global cooperations should not be given more opportunities such as lack of taxes. As globous companies are reluctant to accept this, global cooperation might still be a threat for economies of underdeveloped countries.

To conclude, people do not need global cooperation since it is not eco-friendly, and causes financial problems among countries. Furthermore, global cooperation is believed by some people that it helps people in terms of many perspectives; however, multinational cooperation might be a vital problem because of the effects which it creates.
